Dear Mr. Leopold:

I am sending a carbon copy of the revised introduction to the American Game paper on duck breeding grounds. I would like to have you look this over to see whether I have satisfactorily met your previous criticisms. The discussion of data follows after page 2. Would you mind sending me comments on this as soon as convenient?

Sincerely yours,

Paul L. Errington

P.S. In the manuscript "Lost Legions" this statement is made: "Fifty yards, with a good gun and the best of loads, is plenty far to send a shot charge after almost anything, and very often too far, despite ammunition advertisement to the effect that 80 yards is easy." The reference was of course to Remington's advertisement for their Nitro Express load, which ran in practically all sporting magazines. What do you think of the good or bad strategy of coming out like this?
