Dear Paul:

Your letter to McAtee of December 8 is one of the clearest and simplest statements I have seen for some time. It is an unstrained piece of good writing and I am pleased to see you cultivating it, since if there is any fault to be found with your past writings, it is that they sometimes give the impression of being labored. This decisively does not.

I would keep your carbon of this for incorporation in some future statement.

Yours sincerely,

Aldo

P. S. Your letter about McDonald is just received. He sounds exactly right, but it might be inadvisable to disturb him until he can qualify for graduate status. I am not, however, dropping him from consideration, but will await your arrival in Madison to further discuss the matter. If you think wise, you might send him the correspondence in order to tentatively determine his reaction.

In general, I think we could team up on a lot of these jobs of developing men. A man like McDonald might with profit do a part of his graduate work here and a part with you.

We look forward to seeing you and Mrs. Errington and the Hammerstroms.

A.L.
